was fired from behind a fence near the barn.

The dogs were taken to this spot and started to searching for the scent.

The lead dog, unleashed, pickel it up at once and started off in the direction of Clyde Norris's house. The deputies, holding one dog, which was straining at its leash following the scent, hurried off after the free leader. Meanwhile, Fred Jenkins had been given his breakfast, and when he came out on the porch in charge of Deputy Judd and Jarr, who had taken turns in guarding him during the night, the hounds had disappeared from sight.

Pursuit of the Dogs

Pursuit of the Dogs Leads Jenkins to Confess Leads Jenkins to Confess had taken up the scent and were following it to his house. Little more was needed to induce him to agree to tell all he knew. The jurors who had strayed at neighbors' houses during the night had come in by this time. Seal had not yet been arrested, nor had he come from his home to the house of the dead man, where the inquest was being held. Coroner Lewis assembled the jury again, and Fred Jenkins was resworn.

It was well along in the afternoon when the verdict was reached, and the silicians at once started with their prisoners for the fourteen-mile drive from state Mill, where the crime was committed, to Culpeper. Nobody showed much feeling when the time came to start. There were lots of women gathered at the house, none with less than one baby in her arms, and most of them with one or more at her skirts as well. Nobody wept. Jenkins then went on to tell how they 160ck the gun back to Norris's and left it without the owner knowing. It was not long after Jenkins had finished his confession that the depitles returned with the dogs. They told how the brutes had followed a scent for about two miles, and the turors saw that the story told by Jenkins, or at least that part relating to the movements of Seal and himself, was absolutely correct.

Seal showed up about this time and was placed under arrest. But he has not yet been told of the confession of his son-sin-law.

The jury brought in at once a verdet, finding that Smith came to his death at the hands of William Seal, and Pred Jenkins guilty as accessory in the first, degree.
